Helmet Law Case Study: Recommendation

Motorcycle Helmets Not Hats

3

Both police enforcement and an education campaign are feasible

	Enforcement	Subsidy	Campaign
Political feasibility*
Operational feasibility

Highly feasible  Somewhat feasible  Not very feasible

*Feasibility determined by standardized policy review, stakeholder interviews, and budgetary analysis led by the Institute of Public Health.

Recommendations and next steps

Increasing police enforcement of wearing certified helmets is both feasible and cost-effective. In order to implement this strategy, a compromise on the exact number and required salary for police hires must be reached with the Ministry of the Interior. The police officer training guide and implementation plan must also be reviewed and approved by the Ministries of Interior, Health, and Transport.

The Institute of Public Health will work closely with all stakeholders (Ministries of Transport, Health, and Interior, and Transport; the World Health Organization, and the Asia Injury Prevention Foundation) to develop evidence-based training materials for police enforcement of a standardized motorcycle helmet law, the implementation plan for enforcement, and public relations materials to inform the public.

Fines for police enforcements will have the highest public health impact per dollar invested. A supported implementation plan and agreed upon budget will be essential for success.
